Stories:

Here are some real stories about people who let us know their health care had made them unhappy

Aaron has a learning disability, he isn't able to say what is on his mind and needs help with eating and drinking.

Once he had to stay in hospital overnight and a nurse gave him a pack of sandwiches for his supper.

Aaron wanted the sandwich but couldn't open the packet by himself. In the morning, Aaron's family came to see him and saw Aaron had not been able to eat, and was really hungry.

Aaron's family spoke to the Matron. The Matron spoke to the nurse, and explained where she went wrong, and the nurse apologised to Aaron and his family.

Sally has Down syndrome and sometimes her speech is not very clear.

Sally arrived early for an out-patient appointment at the hospital, and tried to explain this to the receptionist. The receptionist couldn't understand what Sally was saying, and was rude to her.

Sally felt really embarrassed and angry and told the doctor how she felt. The doctor spoke to the manager about Sally's feedback.

The receptionist and manager apologised to Sally, for upsetting her and explained they would now also use a computer system for patients who wanted to check themselves in when they arrive for an appointment.

You can take someone you trust with you to talk to the NHS if you want to.

You can ask for an advocate to support you.

An advocate is a person whose job is to support people to say what they think.
